Hi there,

We've received the DMCA takedown notice (<http://en.support.wordpress.com/copyright-and-the-dmca>) below regarding material published on your WordPress.com site, which means the complainant is asserting ownership of this material and claiming that your use of it is not permitted by him/her or the law. As required by the DMCA, we have disabled public access to the material.

Repeated incidents of copyright infringement will also lead to the permanent suspension of your WordPress.com site. We certainly don't want that to happen, so please delete any other material you may have uploaded for which you don't have the necessary rights and refrain from uploading additional material that you do not have permission to upload. Although we can't provide legal advice, the following link provides resources that might help you make this determination:

<https://en.support.wordpress.com/counter-notice/#what-is-fair-use>

If you'd like, follow the instructions in the applicable point below to remove the DMCA advisory message from your site. If the content in question is:

- * An entire page/post, delete it completely.
- * Part of a page/post, (1) remove the content in question, then (2) reply to this e-mail to request the removal of the DMCA notice that was placed on your site.
- * A media file, such as an image or PDF, (1) remove the media file from the page/post where it appeared, and (2) delete the media file from your Media Library.

Alternatively, if you believe that this DMCA takedown notice was received in error, or if you believe your usage of this material would be considered fair use, it's important that you submit a formal DMCA counter notice to ensure that your WordPress.com site remains operational. If you submit a valid counter notice, we will return the material to your site in 10 business days if the complainant does not reply with legal action.

Please refer to the following pages for more information:

<http://en.support.wordpress.com/counter-notice/>

<http://automattic.com/dmca/dmca-counter-notice/>

Please note that republishing the material yourself, without permission from the copyright holder (even after you have submitted a counter notice) will result in the permanent suspension of your WordPress.com site and/or account.

Thank you.

➡ I have yet to publish this poem, so it appears nowhere online (or should not, anyhow). Because I won an award for it however, a copy of the poem is housed in the University of Arizona's Poetry Center. I believe it was briefly available online after I won the award.

This is a poem I won an award for in 2009. It is entirely my own work and is titled "Tuesdays with Aphrodite" - what appears online is an unauthorized PDF copy of my entire poem.

Was my last post 250 words? I'm not sure, I didn't count - although I have to say that I think poetry can fill up so much mind space with fewer words :)

I think this could be a diary of sorts, which is great since I keep one anyhow. I think today I will vent about my pool. I clean it often, meticulously scrubbing and scooping, calculating the proper amount of chemicals, etc - but invariably, every time - really every time! After I spend hours and hours cleaning within a few hours or maybe a day the wind kicks up and voila! The dirtiest pool in the world once again. It's like washing your car or spraying the weeds to ensure that it will fairly promptly rain. So I call the rain with car washing and lawn maintenance and I call the wind with pool cleaning. Perhaps I really am a witch after all ;-) (as I have been called a time or two by my funny husband).

I think I would like to use this forum for art writing and poetry, also to make fun of myself. This is a great way to keep my family in my loop as well since they all live so very far away. So another poem, this one has been published already so tsk! No copying.

Tuesdays with Aphrodite

O' who forever rubbed you up the wrong way, or down the other and of course he hadn't had any such name.
But we make exceptions in any case,
for the not so long or not forgotten
charisma of blasphemies unspoken savor.

Except there was lilac about you, and sun-luck forever, Aphrodite locks done up like apricots, and arc-etch tracing every little cilium bent on beating the road to one more falling grace.

Those eyes must hold it all in, obliging so much of the earth to sweep under the rough-of-tongue every Tuesday.

Except your slight-of-hand was not meant to cast choke-cherries into the tub, where the capon pecks away and the seed-spill folds another hand in perfect harmony with ruthless nature.

But about the symphony of you at your altar,
combing through your hair with the blush of pomegranate husk.
Your body should be covered with fruit from the stars,
derailing the symmetry of arches and breasts. (Such violent stars!)
